

Legend of Link

Link didn't know that the events of one day could change his life forever, but how could he ever know?

It all started as Link awoke from a horrible nightmare and to a pleasant surprise. . .

He lived in a great powerful forest called Hyrule Forest. It has many inhabitants, elves, as you may call them, due to their pointed ears. They all have a guardian fairy, all except one.

And that person was Link. The person who would become a legend, the person who would once wield the Master Sword.

"What is the Master Sword?" I here you ask. Don't worry, we'll get to that.

Anyway, back to the story. When he awoke, a small sphere of light with wings was floating above him, irritatingly saying "Hey listen!" over and over again.

It suddenly started to beckon Link outside and showed him a sign written in the ancient language, Hyrulian. As one of the residents of Hyrule Forest, he learned to read this language long ago, so began to read.

"The Great Deku Tree wants you to visit him," it read. Link was not a time waster. He automatically understood what it was. The Great Deku Tree often sends messages to the inhabitants using dreams. And the dream that Link had the night before was not good.

It was horrible.

The great princess Zelda, the Master Sword, it was all too much. . .

He fainted.

Chapter 2

Of course, the other people of Hyrule Forest saw this turn of events, so they started to carry Link into his house, into shelter, into safety. For what was about to happen was much worse than just fainting.

The Great Hurricane was about to devastate not only the kingdom of Hyrule, but the world itself. As soon as it hit, Link saw what he never wanted to see in his lifetime.

A small man in a blue and red suit with a bushy brown moustache and a red hat with a large white "M" in the middle.

Mario.

Chapter 3

Link awoke in a cold sweat.

That was the dream.

To be continued. . .
